St. Louis School of Fine Arts
THE Directors of Washington University, as soon as that institution was founded, planned that it should include a department for the study of art. This plan did not materialize until 1874, when Professor Halsey C. Ives organized free evening classes in design and drawing, making use of rooms on the upper floor of the University building. In 1879 the work was taken up by the University, and the Art School was formally established; Professor Ives being appointed director. Through the beneficence of Wayman Crow, the building for the Museum and School was erected in 1881. Seventeen years later the part devoted to class rooms was entirely torn away, and a modern, fireproof building was constructed. At this time the collection of books and prints found a home in the new Library, which is one of the most beautiful rooms in the city. The Museum and School are closely connected, affording an opportunity to study the collections of paintings, statuary, ceramics and art metal work with which the galleries are filled.
