Ex-Chancellor of this Institution
Scholar—Soldier—Gentleman is this volume respectfully dedicated Held how down the ages never are
The tribes of men content to live unстраft
Their little lives, the generations come
And go; and from after the myriads
Take on the aspect of an endless vast Procession; changing, this true, as time flows on,
But slow the change is, and well knows
Old mother Nature how in ceaseless round
Her children come and taste of life awhile,
And pass, deep down the heart of life's the same.
Be thou for them, for them again unfolds
The drama of the world, and as they tread
The path of earth, and the full tide of life,
Woven through their being's depths, there comes
The feeling that not unremembered must Be on the scroll of time, their short span
Of existence. So in many a chronicle doth
And pictured legend handed down, they tell
Their story, tell they too have lived?

Ah! what is a world, the University?
And through it, as the season come and go,
Dreams on the tide of Youth, we in our turn
Live out the student life that ever was there,
In every one of them new creation; and need is
Of words to tell what life that is— to him
Who's of our company, the students know!
And better shall we know, in years to come,
And backward looking to this day that now
Is ours. Love, strange then, comes to us the Before our eyes is done and we are gone
Without the gates; we'll write a line— as one
This way.
