THE HEART OF THE ROSE.

The red rose grew by the garden gate,
On a slender stem and tall,
She raised her head in queenly state,
The most beautiful rose of all.

And I thought the red rose cold and proud,
For her stem bore many a thorn,
And she stood in the midst of the common crowd,
Of flowers with an air of scorn.

But one day, over the pathway there,
She leaned, and brushed my arm,
And I saw the heart of the rose laid bare,
All tender and sweet and warm.

To others, perhaps, she may not disclose
The secret I chanced to see,
But I—I know, for the red, red rose
Has opened her heart to me. —C. C. C.

GRATITUDE.

The New Life murmurs in my ear,
Little green things peer
From their winter sear,
Wings and songs vibrate the air,
Moving all things fair,
Nearing as they dare,
Flirting far away, away,
As if to stay, to stay,—
Yet, soaring but to say,
"How the New Life makes us glad!
And foolish, too, and sad
'Twould be to stay in quite one place,
Kiss but one fair face,
Farewell!—awhile, green life!"

While the lights in color-strife
Sing their color-songs
In waving, silent throngs
Of Beauty, wondrous, glad, New Life—
Life of Living Fray!

—Ah! were there One to thank—
How I could pray. E. W.

"Guess we'll have to stand," I said to Patti Clayton, as we squeezed into the already overcrowded Dinky on our way to the circus—not Ringling Bros.' nor Buffalo Bill's, but far greater than these combined—the "Younivee Surrkuss." Together with the crowd we climbed the hill. Once up there we could see the glare from the hundreds of electric lights and hear a noise that would have made Bedlam seem as quiet as the library with Heller around.

In a minute we were at the gate and then inside. There we stood at the head of the "Pike." Shows on each side of us, and the air full of confetti and excitement.

"HE'S EATING ONE NOW! HE'S EATING ONE NOW! The horrible monster. Hear 'em howl! Hear the poor freshman scream as he pulls him limb from limb! Chesso! Chesso! He eats 'em alive!" So yelled a perspiring fellow in a silk hat and frock coat, with a great resemblance for George Souther. "See the marks of his teeth!" yells George as he holds up a section of corrugated steel bar before the gaping eyes of the crowd. "Now," says George, "for those who don't care for bloodshed we have the famous St. Ambrose Steed, and then for the children you see the great spectacle. Attack on the Block House. All for one admission—10 cents—a tenth of a dollar." In we go with the crowd. Patti fearfully holding my arm lest the brute Chesso eat her (Patti was a freshman then, you know). There in a cage was a wild-looking fur-draped object. A pile of blue books at his side and a big tub of red ink on the floor.
“Uh,” says Patti, “ain’t he nasty!” With that Chesso puffs on the inevitable cigar, opens a blue book and then lets loose: “Vere you git dat, Mr. Robinson?” he howls. “Vy, dat? Huh!!” Splash goes the brush as he smears the book with red ink. “You dr-r-rive me crazy,” he mutters, as he clumsily smears Cobb’s book with the dripping brush. “Let’s go away,” says Patti. “Ah!” says Chesso in delight. Hearing that we stay. “Ah! he says again; “Ah! Mr. Crecelius’s paper! I gif him 110 without looking. Ah! and Miss Glasgow’s paper, too; I gif her 40 without looking.” Seeing my paper next on the pile I hastily lead Patti away all a-tremble from the horrible sight. Next came the Attack on the Blockhouse. With visions of Indians and scalps we approached. There on a table was the blockhouse—a nice little one, fully 8 inches high—sticking out from the top was—a tack—a tack on the blockhouse. With a look at the tailless wooden horse labled St. Ambrose Steed, we pass out. The next was the refreshment stand. Here we contentedly ate a dog and washed him down with some of the famous pink lemonade.

“Now, ladies and gentlemen,” we heard Logan say, “the hardest part of the trick is to make the object go back from under this hat to under the one from which it came." That was enough—we went in to see the famous "Sketches" by the Dramatic Club. "This ought to be good," said Patti. "The last show the Dramatic Club gave was great." This was no fake—there they were, the three sketches—all representing some rural scene and each one carefully marked as being done by the Dramatic Club. "Me-thinks we've been done by George Logan," I said to Patti as we walked out.

"R-r-r-r-rrrrrraaaaa!" yelled Godron. "Iacho, Karamo and Spochilla-a-a-a!" A crowd soon gathered and Burke and Glauber stepped upon the platform, scarcely to be recognized in their Hindoo costumes and brown faces. "Now will some kind gentleman please hand me a dime—a 10-cent piece; thank you," he says, when some one was so reckless as to do it. "You see, I put it in the handkerchief. See! See! Now feel it! feel it!" he says as several feel the dime in the handkerchief. "Now, Paaaa! Gone!" and the dime was gone. "Glad it wasn't mine," I whispered in Patti's ear as we went into the tent to see "The Mystery of the Packing Case." "See," says Burke, "we put the little girl into the box—we lock it—see!—and then in three minutes the girl will be gone." The girl climbs in, snap goes the lock as Prof. Langsdorf himself locks it. "One minute! two minutes! three minutes!" counts Burke. Prof. Chessin opens the lock—audience disappeared—Lo! the girl is gone. "Ah! the great Mathe-matique, the great Mathe-matique." cries Burke, as he sees Prof. Woodward in the audience. "He, the great Mathe-matique, will solve it, he will integrate and find the little girl!" As we went out Prof. Woodward was still integrating. Outside the racket was fierce. "Hello!" shouted Lois and Fred, as they covered Patti with confetti. "Right in here," yelled English. Before I knew it we were going in to see "Wahsousa, the three-legged wonder." Here we stood in front of the much-advertised three-legged monster. As the crowd in front moved we caught sight of the monstrosity—a three-legged chair securely chained to a post. We went out with sadness in our youthful hearts, for it cost me two perfectly good nickels to see that monster. "I guess your weight or you don’t pay!” yells Chamberlin. “Little Harry the Guessing Kid, guesses your weight.” “Here, Miss Hurst, I guess your weight or you don’t pay! Let’s see! Let me see! I guess you at—I guess you at 278 pounds!” “Ha-ha-ha-ha-ha-a-a” gurgles Fannie. She steps on the scales, the crowd leans forward, the beam 278 pounds exactly. “Gee!” says Miss Hurst, “I’ll have to join the cross-country squad.”

“Let’s go up by that crowd.” Patti exclaims. There was a line waiting their turn to get into a little tent illuminated with mysterious blue and green lights. Above was the sign, “Regneh, the Infallible.” “He holds your hand!” In a little while we were inside. There sat Bill Henger in a frowsy Oriental costume, a brown face and fierce mustache. He was just finishing reading Dorothy Marsh’s palm. “Yes,” we heard him whisper to her, “you are in love; he is a small blonde man—a scholar—a professor, I think—he teaches natural history. Yes,” he continued to the delighted Dorothea, “you will be married when you are 24—but not to him; you will marry a minister.” Patti chased me out when he told her fortune, so I don’t know what he told her. Right next to this tent was an ugly black-haired man who hypnotized a big nigger woman. The nigger woman turned her back to the crowd, then the ugly white man would point to different things and say, “Now, Norna, what’s this?” and Norna would tell him right every time. We went into this show even if it did set me back two more dimes. Inside the ugly white man hypnotized the nigger and made her lie down on a platform, the he gave some slips of paper to some of the audience and told them to write ANY question on it and Norna would answer it for them. Patti's slip was marked No. 2. She wrote on hers: "Who is my affinity?" Then the ugly white man collected them and said, "Whose question shall Norna answer first?" No. 2," says Patti quickly. "Norna, give us question No. 2," says the ugly white man. "Who is my affinity," says Norna. "Now the answer to it," says the white man. "Dr. Wernicke," says Norna. That was quite right.

Then we went over to the Faculty nigger-babies. I threw a quarter's worth and knocked Heller down seven times. From there to the swimming match where we paid 20 cents to see a match swim in a dish. "All out for the main show!" was the cry. "All out!" Patti and I hurried along—paid 20 cents more and got a seat in the big tent right up in front. First came Glauber as "Spochilla, the Strong Man." He lifted weights of mass M with an acceleration "a" with ease. Then he bent a big steel bar in his teeth (modulus of elasticity, 30,000,000). "Ain't he grand," said Patti. Then came the dancing ballet girls—only they didn't dance—they sang. There they gamboled, the dainty and graceful Wyatt, the spindle-pinned Patton and the bewitching Lewald, who reminded me of our nigger washwoman, only he was not so graceful. "The next on the program is Herr Kartoffelsalad and Frau Apflekuchen in their gasp-giving tight rope walk," announced the ugly white man. After that the famous Sewlyn family did stunts till Patti's supply of adjectives was exhausted. "The bull fight is next!" the ugly man announced. With a bellow the beast rushed into the tent. Forward rushed the bold matadors. "Zip!" and a dart stuck into the bull's hide. "Snap!" a red blanket cracked in his face. With rage in his eyes the bull charged. Patti covered her eyes and screamed—but Mr. Bull reckoned without Alonzo De Regnano Givehimapillio. One thrust of his trusty hat pin and the beast was chewing the tanbark. One more act—the nerve-racking chariot races—and the first great annual Younivee Surkkuss was a thing of the past—but a grand success.
