FOREWORD

Since civilization dawned, there have come great crises when the institutions of centuries and their product—men and ideas—are placed to the test of determining their value. The civilized world is now passing through such a crucial test. It is yet too soon to decide what institutions will be continued and what ideas previously held will have value for survival and development. Universities have passed through such crises, and the record made by their graduates has added new lustre to the splendid record of the past. This has been true, because it is the function of a real university to produce the rational man who always serves as a leader, living, as he does, not only in a present, but also in a future.
