In the course of our daily process of living we discover that there are several lessons that we need to learn. That is, if we expect to find a sense of satisfaction in living with our associates. The person who is willing to shift with the will of the crowd does not have to concern himself with the lessons of the past or present, of course, but we can afford to question the sense of satisfaction he receives.

Accomplishment in most any area of living is determined by our ability to adjust to the reality that is involved. How well we learned this lesson in the home as children! There were times when we even felt the learning process. In the period of youth we found the demands for ever changing adjustments were manifold. Adulthood is never entirely free from the challenge to change. This is not said to sound a note of pessimism, for actually much of the zest of life is found in privilege to make adjustments.

We have been told that there is no easy road to learning. It is likewise true that there is no easy road to the making of adjustments. We do well in either pursuit to try to make an honest effort. The literature of the ages has attempted to say that one should learn to conform to the best in his environment, even at the expense of personal inconvenience. The writers have been careful to picture the value of results, rather than the ease of the process. This is one of the lessons we need to learn.
